Our Environment is changing: Keep up with the Change.

The Media Is Changing

The media is experiencing a time of extreme fluctuation. Major newspapers are failing and the great fear is that local coverage by experienced reporters is going to be the greatest casualty. That will be compounded by the loss of local environmental reporting—an unacceptable circumstance of being blinded by factors that could compromise our local environment.

At present, the public's awareness of environmental news is disjointed and inadequate because the media mostly panders to the whims of its potential customers, instead of its duty: "conducting itself in accordance with the public interest." Communications Act of 1934

The present tendency by the media to ignore or 'green up' reporting misrepresents reality. The public needs an honest appraisal of their environment in order to respond properly. The Internet, where the media is moving, is especially suited to timely and comprehensive environmental monitoring, but this information must be ferreted out from an almost infinite number of sources.

Finding environmental information that pertains to just Rochester, New York is why this site should be your first stop for informing yourself on our area's environment.
